This appropriation was continued for several years, until a generous bequest from a physician of Salem, Massachusetts, rendered it no longer necessary. This benefactor was Dr. John G. Treadwell. who, by his will, bequeathed to Harvard College his large and valuable library, together with the sum of $5,000, the income of which was to be spent in the purchase of additional books and in subscriptions to medical journals. In case the college did not accept it, it was to be given to the Massachusetts General Hospital. The President and Fellows of Harvard College declined the gift, because of unusual and embarrassing conditions attached to it. These conditions were such as to require the most rigid rules and regulations to be imposed upon the use of the library by those persons to whose care it was entrusted. And so, what seemed...
