At the conclusion of the tragedy, wheh David gives way to his grief for Absalom, he is roused with great dignity and energy by the speech of J oab. When informed by J oab of the death of his son, David exclaims: David. Thou man of blood! thou sepulchre of death! Whose marble breast entombs my bowels quick, Did I not charge thee, nay, entreat thy hand, Even for my sake, to spare my Absalom And hast thou now, in spite of Davids health, And scorn to do my heart some happiness, Given him the sword, and spilt his purple soul Joab. What! irks it David, that he victor breathes, That Juda, and the fields of Israel Should cleanse their faces from their childrens blood What! art thou weary of thy royal rule Is Israels throne a serpent in thine eyes, And he that set thee there, so far from thanks, That thou must curse his servant for his sake Hast thou not said, that, as the morning light, The cloudless morning, so should be thine house, And not as flowers, by the brightest rain, Which grow up quickly, and as quickly fade Hast thou not said, the wicked are as thorns, That cannot be preserved with the hand; And that the man shall touch them must be armed With coats of iron, and garments made of steel And art thou angry he is now cut off, That led the guiltless swarming...
